Apple's macOS 10.14 Mojave not only catapults Yosemite to a well-deserved retirement, but it also brings native GPU-acceleration to the Mac for people with a compatible Mac. This move is largely being made in an effort to encourage better performance for macOS users outside of Apple's ecosystem of Macs and iOS devices, particularly on machines with NVIDIA or AMD GPUs. For various reasons, the shift to the native macOS GPU is full of caveats; not everyone is guaranteed to see performance benefits, and the feature is still early in its development.

people rely on to work. SAN FRANCISCO--(BUSINESS WIRE)-- Today, Adobe Corp. announced the initial results of Adobe's investigation into the scope of the recently discovered Android app backdoor. The investigation, conducted by security researchers at Lookout, Inc., revealed that the backdoor may have been present in more than 100 million Android devices. Adobe forensics experts consulted by Lookout determined that at least 32 versions of the app were in use between early 2015 and April 21, when Google removed the app, and that the versions were used in more than 40 countries. "While Android was designed for mobile phones and tablets, we believe this significant incident shows that Android has failed to meet its fundamental security promise," said Bill Budman, president of Adobe's consumer products group. "We understand that Google and all Android partners have a responsibility to keep users and their private information safe, and we are committed to adding additional safeguards to strengthen the Android platform. Android is at the heart of the Internet's open, mobile and cloud-enabled ecosystem, yet we know too little about what its most vulnerable users are exposed to, and how to address the problem. That's why we created Project Verify, which is launching today to provide greater visibility into which apps pose risks."
