It is very important to focus on the new features as well as point out the lessons learned from past updates. The introduction of Lightroom 5 was a review on a new design approach to photography software, and the use of AI in this design gave the users exactly what they wanted: light computing for images with the changes made to the image editing ability. One of the most sought after features in Adobe Photoshop is the ability to preview and edit an image. One of the features introduced in this release is the ability to hold down the command key to see the version history of an image. The version history panel allows you to choose which edits you made and the date and time you edited them as well as delete any version you did not want to appear. Lightroom offers a certain vision of what photo workflow should look like, and in a nutshell, it's pretty close to a real-time Photoshop app. There's just a few flourishes Adobe has added to make life easier for photographers. I'm a huge fan of the UI changes but I think I also have a point of view which makes me biased. I felt this was a good release and even though some of the new features are more suited to a design tool, they could be useful in any image-editing application. In addition, Lightroom's focus on speed and customization remains extremely valuable. The performance issues, as well as the tendency to crash, are a bit troubling, but manageable if you know how to work around the problems. The only thing missing from Lightroom is the availability of a batch image renaming option to get around the problem of filling a directory's 100 new files after a crash. It's a reasonably minor issue, but I feel that Lightroom could have addressed it, similar to Aperture's workaround. Although most people probably don't need it, Adobe has other design apps for those who do, such as Adobe XD. For the folks looking to use Photoshop for RAW editing without the drawback of Adobe's bloated, slow software, it's another winner for those who had to use the Adobe App to get anything done at all on macOS. Hopefully, some of these features will get merged into Lightroom. The next version that I will look out for is when Adobe adds a new Brush Suite, as it had promised back in April.

The Red Eye Removal tool helps you rid an image of a flash reflection or other stray light, which can cause red eye in photos. Adobe Photoshop also includes a Lens Blur filter that helps you add distracting, beautiful haze to your images. What It Does: The Clone Stamp tool is ideal for cases when you need to unify two similar colors in a given area. To apply the tool, select a source area first, fill that area with your preferred color, and then click and drag the tool to a new location where you'd like to unify the two colors. The Spot Repair tool includes a built-in machine learning algorithm that automatically detects and corrects spots, blemishes, and misaligned objects on your photos. In the instance that it encounters a questionable area, it automatically either mitigates the issue or replaces it with a default replacement like sky. The Pie Chart tool makes it easy to create circular slices of a pie chart from a selection area, automatically painting the desired section with the appropriate color. You can create a pie chart by choosing one or more shapes and then using the Pie Chart tool to paint the area you'd like to be included in your pie chart. To create a pie chart, simply create a circular shape, like a ring, and then click to activate the Pie Chart tool. You'll see a small pie icon next to the cursor. Drag the cursor to a desired location, and a pie slice will be painted at that point.
