Some people say that Internet Explorer is obsolete. Others say Firefox is now the best web browser for Windows. I say they're both right, and while this may not be how it works Apple web and downloadable document viewers are very productive and interesting. I do remember a time when Adobe, Microsoft, Apple, and others strived to become the next Google on the web. That dream was still possible seven years ago but it's all gone now. Among the best examples of this are static websites and websites that use heavily cached databases. The default behavior of a website is to cache content and databases and it's impossible to stop. If you are paranoid, perhaps you should consider hosting your website on a cheap external hard drive or a private Amazon AWS instance. It's also possible to change your website so that it will only render after an Internet connection is renewed. But it's a hassle. Much easier to just disable navigation caching in your browser, of course. In spite of its problems with security and performance, Photoshop Elements remains very popular and it is a superb alternative to Photoshop. I do not use it per se, but I use its Capture One library. It's pretty much the same code base as Lightroom is, but it does not need Adobe Lightroom to run. The public license version of the software has absolutely nothing to do with the office suite. It is not only the successor of Photoshop CS, but also Photoshop itself is really a "publisher".
